The rise of the digital economy looks set to have a positive effect on the battered Spanish job market; The Secretary of State for Employment, Juan Pablo Riesgo, pointed out in his speech at the European Digital Employment Fair that the digital sector will offer up to 300,000 jobs during 2016.

For this, and in the mouth of the state secretary, training is presented, once again, as a mandatory and necessary exit to apply for the jobs offered, in turn, he also spoke of the enormous potential that Spain has in the digital sector with a large talent base, especially among younger people.

As a final note, it is worth mentioning the aid that the executive will implement to promote training and insertion in the technological sectors with an aid bag that will reach 10 million euros.
