China will never stop surprising us, this time it does so thanks to its new project, still in the fertilization phase, which aims to create a mega-city of 130 million inhabitants, according to information from urban platform.

The purpose of this new city is to unite three main cities in the Asian country connected by a high-speed train, the name with which it has been baptized leaves no room for indifference, Jing-jin-ji, coming from the cities of Beijing, Tianjin and Ji.

Within this mega-project, it is also expected to remove 1,200 polluting companies from the urban area and, of course, create all the public services necessary for a city of this caliber. Definitely a milestone.
