The planet is in luck, Barack Obama, president of the United States, announced yesterday a plan that will reduce CO2 emissions by 32% by 2030 compared to 2005 levels. The program, known as the "clean energy plan" It was advanced a year ago and, apparently, after a series of changes it has become an even more ambitious plan than it was at first.

"My Administration will present the final version of the United States' 'Clean Power Plan', the biggest and most important step we have ever taken to combat climate change," the US president commented in a video earlier of the program presentation. The truth is that this announcement is even more important since it has been presented in a key year, a year in which an agreement will be signed at the climate summit in Paris in December so as not to condemn future generations to disastrous climate change. .
