8 centimeters are the ones that separate the planet from sustainability, that is at least what emerges from the latest NASA report that ensures that the sea level has risen that length on average since 1992, a trend that apparently has been will keep for years to come.

This assessment comes to us after the work carried out by a group of scientists from the American space agency, which, how could it be otherwise, blames global warming for the situation solely and exclusively. In turn, the institution also denounces that there are areas that suffer earlier and more fiercely from the ravages caused by this endemic disease, providing documents from areas of the planet where the sea level has risen up to 22 centimeters.
