

THREE READINGS ON GEOPOLITICS IN TIMES OF EXPOSED DIPLOMACY

Posted on 10/12/2010 by Naider

These are days of bare diplomacy. The cablegate opens the doors to the ins and outs of international geopolitics. Piecemeal information, as befits this era of flashes of decontextualized and ephemeral information. I propose three readings in order of interest. From geopolitical-fiction bordering on humor to a review of the emerging world, going through the imperial vision of the oceans.

Joel Kotkin, well-known political writer, urban planner and scholar of future trends, published a few weeks ago a < a href="http://www.newsweek.com/2010/09/26/the-new-world-order-a-map.html"

target="_blank" rel="noopener">article in which he fantasized about a new geostrategic world order marked by the emergence of new global power groups such as a new Hanseatic League made up of the Nordic and Central European countries, the city-States, the North American alliance (formed by Canada and United States), the Bolivarian republics, the Wild East (Afghanistan, Pakistan, Tajikistan,...), etc. Where do you place Spain? In a confused group of countries of Olive Republics, formed by Italy, Portugal, Greece, Bulgaria, Montenegro or Slovenia, among others) marked -I understand- by their belonging to the Mediterranean basin.

Exaggerated? Political-fiction? Reductionist? Probably. But, as stated Enric Juliana in his article on the subject In La Vanguardia, the bad image of Spain in the international arena is worrying. Not to mention, of course, the consideration of a republic that he gives to Spain. Who knows if in the future..... In any case, the author -to whom I refer too many times lately as an excuse to write when I rarely agree with his opinions- remains in a great boutade which also reflects a surprising and reductionist vision of the world, something that we discussed a few days ago in another post.

Beyond the Spanish case, the grouping of countries is also debatable. The category of liberalist countries in Central and South America seems built solely to oppose that feared group of Bolivarian republics, a classic effort by the United States to reserve in its backyard a defensive wall of ideologically close countries. O a category of .city-states that reduces to only four (London, Paris, Singapore and Tel Aviv)

On the other hand, the latest book by journalist and international policy analyst, Robert D. Kaplan, invites us to consider where the