The following video shows us how you don't have to get into a state-of-the-art car and aerospace skids to predict the future. Arthur C. Clarke predicted in 1974, by the way, quite correctly, what kind of machinery we would live with at the beginning of the 21st century. But everything does not end there, since he even dares to make a small assessment of what this would mean for better or worse for the quality of life of society in general.
