Naider is starting work with Berango City Council on its Local Climate and Energy Plan, a roadmap that will help organise the municipality's response to climate change and move towards a more efficient, healthier and more resilient model.

Over the coming months we will analyse the town's energy and climate situation, from energy use and emissions to the main risks linked to heatwaves and heavy rainfall. This work will help identify priorities in areas such as building renovation, sustainable mobility, green infrastructure and the improvement of public space.

The project will combine technical analysis with coordination between municipal departments and the participation of residents and local stakeholders. The plan will set targets and measures for 2030 and 2050, together with monitoring indicators, cost estimates and possible sources of funding.

The City Council will thus have a practical tool to guide investment, assess progress and integrate climate action into municipal management. With this project, Naider strengthens its support to local authorities in turning climate and energy commitments into concrete, participatory and workable action plans.
